Combing Through the Software Rubble

This quick video walks through why last week may have marked a tradable low in software. If that is the case, the next move should create idiosyncratic opportunities in names that were re-rated with the broader group but are more closely tied to the AI buildout than to the disrupted software trade.

Oracle's decline began in October and coincided with peak AI bubble fears that helped drag the entire sector lower and why the narrative has shifted away from the overbuild AI bubble story due to Anthropic's unprecedented success. Instead, the next phase looks increasingly centered on AI compute shortages and the broadening semiconductor and infrastructure needs tied to inference and who they may benefit.

From there, I go through the software angles that best fit my thematic framework and highlight the names I believe investors should be watching closely.
